P R E F A C E.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE CLYDESDALE HORSE SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

YOUR Council have pleasure in presenting to you the Second Volume of the Clydesdale Stud-Book. It consists, properly speaking, of four parts :—First, a short introduction from the pen of the Secretary, containing information as to horse-breeding in Scotland from the earliest date, and the probable origin of the Clydesdale breed ; also, particulars of certain noted animals not mentioned in the history prefixed to the Retrospective Volume ; second, the pedigrees of 461 mares, with their produce ; third, the pedigrees of 338 stallions, foaled before 1st January, 1878 ; and, fourth, an appendix containing corrections on, and fuller particulars of, the pedigrees already published. The conditions upon which the animals have been entered are, that mares should have had produce before 1st January, 1879, and that their pedigree at least should show one cross of blood. The foals of such mares for 1879 have, since entry was taken, been added. Stallions foaled between 1st January, 1875, and 1st January, 1878, were required to possess two crosses at least, and a number of stallions foaled before 1st January, 1875, have been entered on the old conditions of a single cross, to complete pedigrees.

Though invested with a discretionary power to admit animals, the pedigrees of which could not readily be traced owing to the death or absence from the country of the breeder or owner, the Council seldom had occasion to exercise it. As the rules will be more strictly adhered to in future, the Council would wish to remind breeders of the importance of their carefully noting down all events and information connected with their studs, for reference, if required, on future occasions.

The Council take this opportunity of acknowledging the services rendered in the compilation of this volume by Mr. Adam Gray, Ingleston of Borgue, Kirkcudbright, who communicated much valuable information regarding horses bred and owned in the Galloway district during the early part of this century ; also, the assistance they have received in the correction of proofs, and general supervision of all the Aberdeen and North of Scotland pedigrees, from Mr. David Craig Cruikshank, Mains of Dyce, Aberdeen. To others who have assisted them in any way, the Council also here desire to tender their acknowledgments.

INTRODUCTION.

HORSE BREEDING IN SCOTLAND.

IT was remarked by a critic in one of the numerous reviews which appeared of the introductory history to the Retrospective Volume that though it contained much information regarding the more recent events connected with the breeding of Clydesdale horses, the monograph was deficient. This was so far true, and forms an excuse for the present article, which otherwise would have been quite unnecessary. When the present writer, who collated the subject matter, has to explain that the information for the main work of the volume and the exigency of its appearance kept him fully engaged in ransacking the memories of aged breeders and stallion grooms, who, from the long number of their years, might have departed this life at any time, taking with them all their horse lore, he will readily be excused for having accepted unreservedly the remarks of recent agricultural authorities without making researches in the national records and other works likely to throw light upon such a subject. The result of his inquiries has shown him that the agricultural authorities, who wrote upon the subject at the commencement of the present century, did not go much out of their way to find information, and verified or destroyed a tradition according to the hearsay opinions of the oldest inhabitants of the districts connected with their subject.

For this "rough and ready" manner of writing there was much excuse. The stage-coach style of travelling was much more inconvenient and expensive than the railway system of the present day, and records in the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh were not so readily accessible. Moreover it has to be noted that since Aiton wrote many of his valuable treatises on the agriculture of Scotland, archaeologists have been busy at work, and with ancient national records in a partly intelligible form more readily accessible, also the cartularies of the monks translated by the Bannatyne Club, there is not the same liability to make mistakes. The cartularies, indeed, afford much valuable information as to agriculture, but, as in other countries, it has been the art of war, rather than the art of peace, with which horses have up till recent times been associated.

THE ANCIENT SCOTTISH BREED.

It is safe to remark that previous to the invasion of the Romans the horses of Scotland and England were very much the same, varying as to the soil and climate in which they were reared. If not indigenous to the island, they were probably introduced from

Scandinavia by the Norsemen, as they were of the same class and colour with the breeds of horses in the north countries of the Continent. They were very small, and are, says Campbell Smith, “supposed to be represented by the Scottish, Welsh, and the New Forest and Dartmoor Breeds. Their characteristic features were a heavy, low form, bushy manes and tails; and,” says the author just quoted, “may have been black or dun, with a black streak down the spine, which marks the wild races of Northern Europe.” This latter type of animal, known as an “eel-backed dun,” may still be met with in Scotland, particularly amongst the Highland ponies, which possibly have, however, been more recently bred from the Scandinavian stock, as the Norsemen about the time of Haco were known to carry hardy, small horses in their boats for aggressive purposes. St. Austin says that “the Manii or ponies from Great Britain were generally in use amongst strolling performers to exhibit in feats of their craft.” In this form of pony we can readily recognise the little “sheltie,” but there is reason to believe that the average British pony was of larger build, just according to the soil, and, indeed, was till about a century and a half ago fitly represented by the Galloway, of which more anon. Notwithstanding the evidence of St. Austin,

Mr. Cosmo Innes expresses an opinion, judging from figures of horses and horsemen in the churchyard of Meigle, that charioteering was practised in Scotland previous to the invasion of the Romans, when a much larger animal than the ponies described must have been used. If so, and the poems of Ossian are believed to be genuine translations, this art of war must have been practised by the ancient Gaels, as “a thin-maned horse,” with elegant head and all the characteristic features of the breeds used by the Scythians, is there described.

Boece in his accounts of the ancient battles between the Picts and Scots, makes little mention of horses, and the contests were no doubt fought on foot. At a later period he does indeed mention the armies of two chiefs as having fought till their "coursiers" were tired, and there is some reason to believe that the rude Galwegians were amongst the first in Scotland to use the horse in battle.

THE SOUTHERN BREEDS.

As regards the breeds of horses in England, it is quite obvious that they became very much mixed in blood, the Romans introducing one breed of horses, the Anglo-Saxons another, while the Scandinavians introduced a third. The Romans, who were very poor judges of horses, and were greatly victimised by the Jewish horse-dealers of the time, drew their supplies from the Euxine breeds which were smaller than the black races of Western Germany, and the bays of Asia and Africa; but it has to be remembered that in these days the soldier, however heavily encumbered with armour, had to vault on to the horse's back; the starpes or stirrup, first used by the Saracens, not having been invented till the 11th century. A horse higher than 15 hands was not therefore desirable. The Anglo-Saxons probably brought over with them several of the black horses of Western Germany, and represented by the Flemish horse. This heavy animal was not in these days suited for cavalry purposes, but was well fitted for draught, and no doubt was used for such, as in a piece of Bayeux tapestry, which represents the landing of William of Normandy at the battle of Hastings, there is the picture of a man leading a horse attached to a harrow, and this, indeed, is the first indication, pictorial or otherwise, of horses having been used in this country for agricultural purposes; though an old Welsh statute of the tenth century prohibits a farmer to plough with horses or mares, cows or oxen alone being allowed to be used. The Normans, being splendid cavalry men, introduced, there can be no doubt, numerous fine horses, and as the practice of castration was not common then, the breeds must have been much improved. In the northern part of the country, however, the people still preserved their independence, and there is every reason to believe that the hardy Scotch or Norwegian pony remained true to his original features and type for some time after, though in

First Arab Horse in Scot-

Wynton's Ballads King Alexander the First is described in a visit to St. Andrews as mounted on “ Hys cumly sted of Araby, Sadelyd and brydeled costlikly.”

This, indeed, is the first record of the introduction of an Arabian horse into Great Britain. Though crossing from this parent breed of our noted thorough-bred was carried on at the time of Alexander II., it had not made impression on the native stock, as Matthew Paris, the historian monk of St. Albans, describes the cavalry of that monarch on his English invasion, about the middle of the twelfth century, as being well mounted “on horses which were neither Spanish or Italian.” From the Norse account of the expedition of the battle of Largs, in the reign of the subsequent king, we find, however, that the knights and leaders of the Scotch army were completely armed from head to heel in mail, and their horses were covered with steel breast-plates. The knights and leaders were mounted on Spanish horses, and the rest on small active horses, protected by steel breast-plates. The occasion of

Spanish Horses
of Largs.

Spanish horses being introduced into Scotland, there is little reason to doubt, was their superiority in carrying weight, &c., as the Normans had introduced the system of heavy armour, hitherto unknown to the Scoto-Saxons of the Teviotdale side, who had previously only worn coats of mail, which left the limbs full room for action. Those Spanish horses were, no doubt, descended from the Arab horses introduced into Spain about the commencement of the eighth century, the Moors, indeed, being the first to introduce the Arabian horse into Europe.

About this time considerable attention was paid to the breeding of horses by the churchmen; and the monks of Melrose, says Mr. Cosmo Innes in his introduction to the cartulary of that monastery, preserved by the Bannatyne Club, had, as early as the twelfth century, a grant from Odenil de Umfravil, Lord of Prudhoe, of the tithe colts of his haraz, or stud of brood mares, extended by his descendants to the tenth colt which pastured in their forest west of Cottenshoe. The monks branded these colts, and allowed them to follow their dams in the forest till they were two years old. From an inventory preserved in the cartulary of Newbattle, the monks of Melrose “possessed in old times three hundred and twenty-five forest mares and horses, fifty-four domestic mares, a hundred and four domestic horses, two hundred and seven stags, or young horses, thirty-nine three-year old colts, and a hundred and seventy-two-year old colts.” The domestic horses, it may be said, were different from the war horses, “that prance and nicher at a speir,” as Johnnie Armstrong’s did, and were used for the conveyance of agricultural produce by packs over long distances, oxen being used in the more common agricultural operations. We, therefore, find in the Chamberlain Accounts of Lesmahagow Sanctuary, “in account,” as would be said in modern times, the following:

“ AVENE (OATS).

“ De Quibus (concerning which) allowed to the comptare for the expenses of my lord and his servandis coming to Lesmahago in mense Novembri in anno computi r'efervand to the deit of the accounts ij ch. 1 boll avenarum (two chalders one boll of oats).”

This appears, therefore, as an item in the account as a set-off to the account for carriage of the can or kane to the monks. It may be mentioned here that the land was then divided into “plough-lands,” the Scotch plough of the 13th century and for three centuries afterwards being, as described by Innes, “a ponderous machine drawn by twelve oxen.”

The Ancient Scotch Plough.

Though the benefit of the introduction of large horses is, without inquiry into the subject, very naturally set down as having been prompted by the necessities of agriculture, it has to be pointed out that it was entirely for a different purpose, viz., the increase of the size and weight of the war horses, in order that they might be the more able to carry the increased weight of armour. In the Rotuli Scotiæ of 1352 we find, therefore, William, Earl of Douglas, in Lanark, favoured with a “safe conduct” from Edward for ten large horses to be taken from Scotland into Teviotdale, then in possession of the English.

The following is a literal extract from the Rotuli Scotiæ, dated 1st July, 1352.

[TRANSLATION.]

The King, to all and each of these "vicecomitibȝ," greater bailies, officers, and other faithful subjects, to whom greeting. Know then that as William of Douglas, Knight of Scotland, is causing 10 grooms and 10 large horses, belonging to the said William of Douglas, to come from certain places in Scotland to certain places in parts of Teviotdale, in his (the King's) dominions—know that he remains there under our protection. We have received these same horses and the grooms having charge of them, under a special protection and safeguard. And therefore we order you, giving strict injunctions, not to do harm, or as far as in you lies, to allow others to do harm to the same horses and grooms, thus remaining in the said parts of Teviotdale, &c., as in all like cases. In testimony of which this peace lasts to the feast of St. Michael.

T. R. at Westminster, the first day of July.

This safe conduct was granted to Douglas when in London arranging possibly as to the ransom of the captive King, David II., as there is another in almost similar terms on the same date in favour of Archibald Douglas, Andrew de Ormiston de Scotiæ, and William de Douglas to return to Scotland.

It does not unfortunately say where the horses came from, but as Baliol held the Douglas estates, it would appear as if they were to be taken from Lanarkshire into Teviotdale, then in possession of the English. Douglas's quarrel with his kinsman, William of Douglas, the Knight of Liddesdale, whom he slew, taking possession of his estates; his rupture with King Edward of England, and his turning of Baliol out of the ancestral estates of the Douglas family in Liddesdale, Annandale and Clydesdale, leave little room for doubt that, if large horses did not exist in Lanarkshire previous to this date, as the extensive trade done with Flanders by the Scottish merchants lead us to believe they did, some, if not all, of the black stallions found their way to Douglas Castle in the Upper Ward of Lanarkshire.

Origin of the Clydesdale. It will be recollectcd, by readers of the Retrospective Volume, that Mr. Ure of Rutherglen stated that there was a tradition that an ancestor of the Duke of Hamilton brought six coach horses to Strathaven, and that Aiton disproved this tradition satisfactorily to himself from local inquiry. The above extract shows, however, that the tradition originated from a circumstance which occurred much more than a century previous to Mr. Ure's time of writing. The Earl of Douglas, it may be remarked, was one of the ancestors of the Duke of Hamilton, the families having become joined in marriage, and it is possibly owing to this that so many mistakes have arisen as to the introduction of these black horses. It is noticeable, however, and it is indeed mentioned by the reverend chronicler of Rutherglen, that the farmers of the Upper Ward in which the Douglas estates are situated, were the first to rank as improvers in the breed of horses in Scotland. Possibly certain of the horses may have been stationed at Strathaven Castle, which was occupied by Lord Douglas soon after his return from England, when he ejected Baliol who, as has been mentioned, then occupied his Castle of Douglas and other important strongholds in Clydesdale. These horses, there can be no doubt, were the large sooty black horses of Flanders—(Flanders was then in the occupation of the English)—and the Flemish archives show that during the dynasty of the Plantagenets many of them were taken to England. Moreover in all the safe conducts granted to knights, merchants, and others, mention is only made of the word “equos,” so that the addition of the word “magnoes” plainly shows that the horses were larger than common. That Edward I. was subsequently jealous of the Scotch obtaining this breed is shown by the fact that he would only allow a German dealer permission to embark a stallion on the condition that he would not take it to Scotland.

The Scottish breeds of horses at this time must have become The Breeds much mixed, as Douglas and other knights having fought in France no doubt brought back some of the cavalry chargers used in that country, while the French knights who returned with him to Scotland must also have brought with them numerous horses.
During the time of David II. rich caravans passed from Scotland through England and into the Continent, attended by large retainers of horsemen, sixty-five passports being granted on one occasion to a party of sixty-five merchants, whose warlike suite, says Tytler, “amounted to two hundred and thirty horsemen.”
That Scotland possessed good horses at that time is clear from the fact that they were then and for some time afterwards numbered amongst her exports, with wool, hides, skins, and cargoes of fish, in return for wines, spices, and arms and armour.

There can be no doubt, therefore, that in the reign of David II. there were introduced into Scotland several varieties of horses, which, mixed with the smaller animals, supposed, if not indigenous, to have been introduced by the Norwegian colonists, generally improved the breed. Except, however, that James IV. began to import horses from Spain and Poland to improve the Scottish stocks, there is no mention subsequent to the reign of David of any individual effort in that direction, though there is little doubt that much new horse blood was introduced by the traders in their commercial intercourse with the Continent.

The Breeds allowed to degenerate.

During the latter days of the Stuarts, however, the breed was allowed to degenerate, for a French writer remarks that so late as the reign of Queen Mary the Scotch cavalry were wretchedly mounted. Mair, also writing in 1542, says that the Highlanders came into Perth, some possessing between 200 and 300 horses, each of which they sold at prices as low as two francs apiece.

Poor condition of Agriculture.

There is reason to suppose that the disturbed condition of the country, and the wretched state of agriculture at the time, checked the advance in the improvement of horse-breeding as of everything else, and when we find Pinkerton in his history stating that "the cottar who raises his hovel of straw under an old thorn and cultivates three or four acres of the common, would in those days have been called a farmer," there is no wonder that little attention was paid to it by that class. Cultivation of the land was, however, for a long time considered to be but the work of the lower classes, the middle classes attending their superiors in the too numerous raids and forays.

Pack horses. Save the horses used for the carriage of produce to a distance, of which in summer each animal carried on his back three bolls of corn, two bolls of salt, or one and a half of coals, none were required for agriculture; the Scotch plough, from the twelfth to the fifteenth century inclusive, being a heavy machine, drawn by twelve oxen. Some improvements were gradually made in this implement, and so we find the team of oxen reduced to seven or six, according to the tenacity of the land. Thus in the old ballad of "Jockie said to Jenny" the farmer bounces that beside having "goud and gear and land eneuch, he has seven goud owsen gangin in a pleugh;" while the toper in the well-known Bacchanalian song of "Guid ale comes and guid ale goes," sings that he had "six owsen in a pleugh," all of which he drank just "ane by ane," a system of displenishing that would scarcely be tolerated now-a-days. Symson in his description of Galloway, writing in 1684, says "that the people there tilled mostly with eight oxen, but usually with ten, which are not so expensive in keeping as four horses." The animals.

Improvements in the Scotch Plough.

too, afforded considerable compensation for their food by way of manure, and could be fattened and sold off when convenient. In several parts of the Stewartry, he says, "they till with four horses all abreast, and joined together to a small tree, before which a boy or sometimes a woman leads going backward. In the meantime another strong man has a strong stick about four feet long, with an iron hook, at the lower end with which, being put into another iron fastened to the end of the plough beam, and leaning on in the upper end of the stick and guiding it with his hands, he holds the plough beam up and down according as he finds the grind deep or shallow."

With considerable improvements effected in the plough, and a desire, no doubt, to save as much pasture for the cows for cheese-making, the oxen were gradually superseded by horses. At first the teams were mixed, and horses and oxen yoked together, but this system must very early have been found objectionable, and four horses yoked, two and two, became the common system, and so we find Burns in his Inventory describing his team as "lan'afores," and "lan'ahins," and "fur'ahins," meaning literally the fore land and hind land and hind furrow horses.

MODERN OR AGRICULTURAL PERIOD OF HORSE BREEDING.

THE demand for plough horses for all parts of Scotland caused increased attention to be paid to them by breeders, and the men of the Upper Ward of Lanarkshire, as the Rev. David Ure bears testimony, were exceedingly careful in their selection of mares and stallions to breed from. The horses of Clydesdale had long before this time, however, become famous, for the fairs of Rutherglen were regularly resorted to by those in quest of superior animals. In Pinkerton's ballads we find a satire, evidently written about the commencement of Lent, in which the writer finds fault with the magistrates for allowing the fair, which was of old repute, to cease:—

The fair and mercat of our toun,
I mean the mercat of our horse,
Qhuilk nather comes to port nor cross.

It appears from the same quaint work that "many nobills" of the country regularly visited St. Luke's Fair, Rutherglen, with the object of selecting good riding horses.

The farm horses up to the commencement of the present century and for some time afterwards were much lighter than they are now, and were generally capable of being used as saddle horses by the farmers when attending fairs. A turn of speed was then desiderated, for there was many a rough-ritten race homewards from the market town, and "riding the broos," an ancient wedding contest amongst the horsemen, now out of custom, was very common.

In the reports of statistical writers appointed to give accounts of the agriculture of the different counties of Scotland in 1794, excellently abridged by Mr. A. Ramsay, of Banff, in his History of the Highland and Agricultural Society, much information is given about the modes of cultivation and the quality of the horses used by farmers. Previous to that time, it may be mentioned, prizes had been awarded by the Society of Improvers in Edinburgh, the first in 1759, when the premium of "15 guineas for the best draught stallion was won by William Whyte, tenant in Bows, Polmont, for a bay stallion called Red Robin." "In Ayrshire," writes Col. Fullarton of Fullarton, "the horses are short and active on their legs, hard in hoofs, large in arm, and very deep and powerful in the counter." Dr. Johnston reports of Kirkeudbright "that the horses used were mostly Galloways." I am inclined, however, to think that the blood of "the neat hardy, little breed of horses," written of by Symson a century previous, which were sold at Wigtown Fair, had by this time been adulterated, if not improved, with a view to their supplanting the oxen in the plough.

These Galloways were unquestionably the ancient indigenous or Norse breed which, from Galloway up to that time and for some years afterwards, being in its peninsular position clear of Border traffic, peaceful or otherwise, remained true to their ancient type and character. Of Wigtownshire it is reported that the horses were of a light handsome race, fit for saddle load or draught. The ancient Galloways of that quarter had been improved by the introduction of stallions (of what breed is not stated) by the Earl of Galloway and Mr. Keith Stewart.

Most of the other reports speak to the improvement of the local breed by purchases made in Lanarkshire at Hamilton and Rutherglen; and Ure, as has been mentioned before, testifies to the attention which the breeders of the Upper Ward paid to the choosing of the animals to be used in the stud. Against Mr. Ure's testimony, and that of most of the reports of the statistical writers, it is curious to find Aiton praising this breed, yet denying that it is more common to Lanarkshire than the whole of Scotland. In the British Farmer's Magazine he writes on "The Lanarkshire Breed of Horses" as follows:—"The breed of horses generally, though erroneously, termed the Lanarkshire or Clydesdale Breed is the most valuable breed of draft horses in Britain, and that not only 'for farming business,' but for every description of work where strength, agility, and docility of temper are required, that are anywhere to be met with, and that whether the grounds or roads in which they are employed are hilly or more level. They are natives of every county of Scotland south of the Tay, and therefore ought rather to be denominated the Scottish breed of horses. In all the moorish districts and even where the land is of a medium quality, the farmers keep some mares which, besides bringing them a foal every year or second year, perform their ploughing and ordinary light farm work as well as the horses, except a few months in summer when sucking their colts, and at that season farmers of that sort of land have but little work for their horses, while their colts bring them good prices. This mode of rearing young horses does not prevail in Lanarkshire more than in all the southern and middle counties of Scotland, and the breeds of horses in all these counties are all much the same as in Lanarkshire."

Probably had Aiton not disproved, as has been pointed out, to his own entire satisfaction that the report as to the introduction of large stallions into Clydesdale was without foundation, he would not have written so strongly. No doubt his theory as to the better feeding and treatment having improved the breed is plausible, but that the Clydesdale originally possessed, and still possesses many of the characteristics of the Flemish breed is undoubted; the fringe of hair down the back of the leg being one of the most prominent as a genuine mark of a Flemish horse. That the Clydesdale has improved by judicious mixing is certain, and the improvement is also no doubt largely owing to instinct; so long engendered in the natives of the Upper Ward, one of whom it is mentioned in the history to the Dunmore volume, no doubt having heard traditionally of the fact of the introduction of large horses into the Douglas estates, went all the way into England to secure one out of a lot of Flemish horses, which had been imported into the Midlands. From the articles in a large and handsome work on our "National Breeds of Animals," published under the auspices of the Highland and Agricultural Society, with beautiful illustrations by Howe, it would appear that the Upper Ward farmers brought several animals from England, which bred well. Thus in an account of "Meg," which won first prize at the Highland and Agricultural Society's Show at Glasgow in 1828, it was said that she was by a grandson of Young Britain, by James Thompson's (of Broomfield, Glasgow) Britain, a grandson of Blaze, a horse belonging to Mr. Scott, of Brownhill, Carstairs, Lanark, which, as mentioned in the history to the Retrospective Volume, won the first prize at a show held in the Grass-market, Edinburgh in 1785. Blaze, which travelled in the Lothians and Berwickshire, is described as a beautiful jet black, his legs silvery white to the knees and hocks, and a broad white stripe or blaze down the face. In a letter from Mr. French of Burnhouses, who, at the request of the editor of the volume, waited upon Mr. Scott, an English draught horse. This may possibly have been the case, but from the description given of the heavy black horses of England of that period it is not likely to have been one of them, but more likely a Cleveland, if not one of the lighter legged pack horses used in Yorkshire and other parts of England at the commencement of the present century. The dam of Young Briton is also reported to have been a Derbyshire mare. Meg, which is a brown with white markings, the same colour as her dam, is a stylish, upstanding, lengthy mare, with an exceedingly neat head, and clean legs; in fact, she is what would now-a-days almost be described by West country dealers as "gyp." A portrait is also given in the work of a noted horse, Young Clydesdale, a stallion of considerable reputation at the time in the Lothians and Berwick. He is represented in plough harness, with collar and "breeching," a costume now rarely seen on a stallion. Like Meg, he seems to possess a thorough-bred look about the head, in which is set a very full vigorous eye, has a shoulder well sloped, and an apparently clean fore-leg, with a slight fringe. His fault on the portrait, which, it has to be remarked, is drawn from life, is want of muscular development in the hind quarters and thighs. There is a total absence, as in the case of Meg, of superfluous hair, the pastern joints and foot being clearly defined. In colour Young Clydesdale was a jet black, with white markings. He is said to have been descended from Blaze, the colours of the most successful progeny of which seem to have been blacks and greys—colours not now in favour, the latter being, as regards entire colts, very unfashionable. This is, no doubt, owing to the action of the Highland and Agricultural Society in restricting their competition to black bays and brown bays, and Mr. Frame's practice of castrating all grey colts.

Probably the Directors thought grey an unsuitable colour at the time for horses for agricultural purposes. As the ban is now removed in competition, and as grey horses look particularly stylish in street lorries, little objection can be taken to them. Grey horses, Greys. it may be remarked, are of a different original stock to either blacks or bays, Campbell Smith in his work being of opinion that they are part of the original grey or white stock of the Euxine, and that they are always of higher stature than the bays, which are from Africa, the Teutonic word bayard, from which, in his opinion, the word bay is derived, signifying "a horse." It is worthy of notice that the latter word is never used to denote colours of animals other than horses. The greys are always, too, it will be observed, strong, handsome horses, and in days when the colour was more fashionable amongst breeders, were preferred as cavalry chargers, hence those magnificent horses of the Scots Greys which evoked the admiration of Napoleon I. at Waterloo. That the breed was distinct in descent till mixed within the past 150 years, or so, may be noted from the fact that you rarely if ever get a grey without that the sire or dam is grey, while the fact that you can get a brown from a grey or with a grey stallion shows that the strain has gradually been overpowered by the denser blood of the blacks and browns.

It has been remarked that the Clydesdale has been improved as regards size and strength during the past 30 or 40 years, or since the period when Young Clydesdale's type was fashionable. A good deal of this is due to the admixture of blood from the south, which has, however, been done at the risk of losing ancient important characteristics of activity and quality. These breeders who have worked in this direction have generally, however, kept the Clydesdale type in view, and no doubt many of the animals brought back were crosses from the Scotch horses or mares, which the South country buyers purchased from time to time at the Scottish fairs, but the pedigrees of which could not unfortunately be traced. The breed, therefore, has not been so much improved as some writers would try to make out, and at Kilburn Show the merest tyro in horses could distinguish in their classes the Clydesdales from the more ponderous but less active draught horses of the English shires.

It is well known that the Clydesdale owes its quality and other good characteristics to the pasture ; sluggishness, and coarse greasy legs, being the characteristics of animals reared in low lying lands with moist pastures ; while on dry hill or mixed sandy lands the grass of which contains plenty of lime, active animals with sound clean legs and healthy durable hoofs are bred and grazed to advantage. As regards this now well recognised fact, I can do no better than quote some of the remarks in an article written before 1819, said to be translated from an essay by a celebrated Polish authority, Count Wenceslas Rzeiwuski.

“ The perfection of the horse, that is to say the clearness of its head, its slender body, its great strength, combined with abundance of spirit, is derived chiefly from the excellence of the renders the head clumsy, the jaws of an unseemly shape, the eyes weak, the belly slack and unable to digest the food, the chest fleshy, the legs thick and liable to different diseases. It is this which debilitates the constitution, renders the movement of the horse sluggish and ungraceful, and extinguishes its fine natural spirit, and renders it vicious or stupid. On the other hand it is in the dry pastures of Arabia, Persia, &c., that we find those horses, which on account of their superior strength and action, and sagacity and spirit, are admired by all the world. The interior of Arabia and of Persia is a plain sufficiently elevated above the level of the sea to render the pasture dry, aromatic, and wholesome, surcharged with none of those saline particles which it is true give lustre to the skin, but which at the same time render it difficult to become habituated to any country of a different climate, to which it may be transported.”

Further on the same writer remarks :—“ The plains of Prussia being raised to a considerable height above the level of the sea, and consisting of a bed of earth upon a foundation of granite, and the plains of Arabia being also sufficiently, although not so much above the level of the sea, and having a portion of sand mixed with the vegetable soil (a circumstance of great advantage in pasture ground), these two countries being thus naturally dry, by means of their heat, attract the moisture from the horse ; while on the other hand the aromatic herbs which are strong and succulent, chase from him those humours, the exudation of which is favoured by the imperceptible but continual prostration of a hot climate. Thus the horses of these countries are very seldom affected with strangles and glandular diseases; their legs are well proportioned, and the hoof is compact and hard."

Many breeders of Clydesdales will recognise the truth of the foregoing remarks from their own experience. Indeed to the rich sand-mixed lands of Kintyre, the healthy herbage which covers the thin soils of the Galloways, and the nourishing blades of grass which cover the lime-containing hills of Lanarkshire, the Clydesdale of the present day greatly owes his activity and quality, characteristics which have always rendered him superior in the eyes of the foreigner when viewed alongside his more massive market competitor in the South, reared on the "wershy" herbage of the fens.

HORSES FOR OTHER THAN DRAUGHT PURPOSES.

It will be denied by few that Scotland possesses at present little reputation for horses other than those used for draught purposes. Of the ancient breeds the Galloway has long since disappeared, and the shaggy little Shetland pony is undoubtedly the only true representative of the original native stocks. The necessities of agriculture have in recent days caused such a mixture of the hardy little Highlander with the modern Clydesdale that he too is rarely recognisable. Horse-racing in Scotland is a very old pastime, Royal Caledonian Hunt. judging from the dates on the ancient trophies—the Silver Bells of the Lanark and Paisley gatherings, but few good racehorses are now bred north of the Tweed, and the fact that the Royal Caledonian Hunt gives an allowance of weight in certain races to Scotch-bred horses is significant. The climate is indeed too cold for the thorough-bred, which, as is well known, is sprung from Arabian, Turkish, and other horses, all peculiar to warmer and dryer atmospheres. At the commencement of the present century the Royal Caledonian Hunt did much towards improving the riding horses of the farmers, and George IV. highly admired the turn-out of the yeomanry cavalry on his visit to Edinburgh. In these days, however, the Hunters' Stakes of the Caledonian Hunt were run in four mile heats at weights ranging from 11 st. 7 lbs. to 12 st. 7 lbs., so that much more serviceable horses for yeomanry purposes must have been raised in these days than now, when the test is single over a distance rarely longer than two miles. Many good hunting horses were then bred in Scotland, the stud of Robert Baird, Esq. of Newburgh, Master of the Lothian Foxhounds, and one of the early promoters of the Caledonian Hunt, being famous in this respect. The instincts of the agricultural classes, so far as horses are concerned, do not favour the breeding of either racehorses, hunters, or roadsters, nor does the prevailing system of farming, which, except in a few of the counties of Scotland, requires all the attention the farmer can afford to give it. The young draught horse can, on the other hand, take very good care of itself, and, coming earlier to maturity, is generally a source of profit, whether if sold off as surplus stock or retained to do the work of the farm.

PROGRESSIVE HISTORY OF THE CLYDESDALE BREED.

THE progressive history of the Clydesdale breed from the days of the late Mr. Somerville of Lampits down through the times of the late Messrs. James Frame of Broomfield and William Fulton of Sproulston, has been so fully detailed in the Dunmore volume that nothing further remains to be said here. In detailing the early particulars of the Drumore strain of blood a mistake was made, which it is now best to rectify. Mr. Anderson of Drumore is stated, at page 24, to have bought two mares in Lanarkshire—one a grand-daughter of the dam of Glancer (335), alias "Thompson's black horse," and another from Mr. John Young, Bröwnmuir, Lochwinnoch, which subsequently won first prize at the Highland and Agricultural Society's Show at Ayr in 1835. This was the black mare known as Drumore "Old Tibbie," bred by Mr. Brown, Gledstane, Biggar, Lanarkshire, and she it was, and not the other, which proved the progenitor of the illustrious Victor (892), as mentioned in vol. I.

In regard to the black horse Glancer most of the particulars have also been given in vol. I. The following, a literal copy of a small handbill of the horse, distributed by Mr. Thompson, may be interesting:—

FUTURE OF DRAUGHT HORSE BREEDING.

It does not require any great power of foresight to give a dim outline of the future of the breeds of draught horses. From the very earliest period the horse has been subject to the will of man, not only as regards the mere breaking and training of the individual animal, but the perpetuation of itself to suit the purposes he may have in view at the time. The battle cars of the Scythians required horses of speed and power in the draught, and horses to suit were accordingly bred: the abandonment of the car in war, and the introduction of the cavalry system, necessitated a horse which must have been able to carry weight. The introduction of heavy armour necessitated the breeding of a still heavier horse, and its abolition again the necessity of speedier and more active animals. The pack horse, the horse of the mail coach, the smart horse of the farmer fitted either for the plough or saddle, and the modern Clydesdale, capable of taking his three tons along the street on a lorry, have all been developed according to the mind of man to suit his requirements. That more changes will follow there can be no doubt. The British farmer, indeed, at the present day has to be alive to every change of a world quickly changing through the ease and frequency of contact, the result of the speed of travel, and the telegraphic system of communicating intelligence. As regards the breeding of horses for profit from the towns, he will therefore have to be able to change his front and make flank movements with the speed and dexterity of the Numidian cavalry of old.

One of the most frequent scares to horse breeders is the invention of some new motive or rather locomotive power. The railway system drove many good propagators of the horse out of the field, but the result has been that steam travelling has developed a greater demand for horses than ever before existed. Such, there is every reason to believe, will be the case in the future; the invention of some new locomotive and its application to purposes of trade, will not drive the noble animal out of the field—it will merely cause the mind of man to change the mould, to develop it to suit some new requirement.

During the past few years, there has been a considerable change in the purposes for which draught horses are required. The fat, sleepy lorry horse, such as the small brewer delighted to look upon carrying his barrels from door to door, has had to give way in order to meet the exigencies of commerce. The canals of traffic cannot be impeded to gratify the whim of any individual not a student of horse flesh, but who thinks it necessary that his business should be represented in the street by some inactive but imposing animal. The whims of private firms who like this sort of thing will always be respected by horse dealers; but the contractors for railways and other large carrying companies supply the real tests, that of hard work and endurance. With the latter, rapidity of transit, and, consequently, activity in the animals employed, has become an important element; and therefore a revolution has set in against ponderous, thick-legged, but comparatively spiritless animals. The horse which throws his weight into the collar, steps out freely and fast at a walk, and can raise a trot when required, is the horse for street purposes at the present day. Moreover, there are plenty of indications that this type of horse will be gradually developed through circumstances. The granite pavements were originally designed to withstand the rutting of the cart wheels, and the aid of the horse as regards "dead pulling"; the severe effects of concussion, shaking, &c., on the animal were never contemplated.

The writer has, however, seen quite enough to convince him that the adoption of wood pavements or something similar would cause a decrease, to say the least about it, of 10 per cent. per annum on street carriage. Anyone who has watched the horse with his iron shoes skating along the irregular granite streets, and followed him with his eye along the wood pavement will notice how freely he walks on the latter; in fact, he will frequently break into a trot on finding everything going so smooth and regular. Speed of locomotion being therefore according to the requirements of the age, the breeder should always keep it in view.

It has been frequently suggested that the exclusiveness of stud book registration would prevent the improvement of the breed, in so far as crossing with superior animals would be restricted. In this there is only the same little logical element which can be brought forward against all changes, viz., that a small amount of harm is the sacrifice for a great amount of good. All systems are similar; there can be no deviation from their lines to include a little good which lies beyond the boundary, and exclude the evil. The bloods of all animals which can be mated are, however, very much like chemical substances, and, like such, should be experimented with carefully. No chemist would think of throwing certain substances into his retort at random; the penalty, as he knows, might be explosion and death. Nor should the breeder of horses work towards any combination of horse-^{Mating of} _{animals.} flesh without knowing the ingredients which he wishes to put together. Those who ignore the lessons of history, say that horse-breeding is entirely accidental; the truth is, that narrow minds cannot learn anything beyond their own experience. The comparatively uneducated gardener can by his skill work upon the vegetable kingdom, to mix by grafting flower and foliage; and the poultry fancier, the pigeon fancier, and the dog fancier can also speak to many well-defined results of their efforts at mating animals. The horse is, however, one of the slowest animals, as regards propagation, and so without registration experiments are lost sight of. History, however, shows that the horse and cow is as capable of being moulded to suit our purposes as the dog. The modern racing thorough-bred and the shorthorn are strong evidences of what can be done through the assistance of registration.

Occasionally an argument crops up on the subject of "inbreeding," and a great amount of irrelevant matter appears. It has, indeed, been used as argument against stud-books. Stud books are, however, merely intended as the record books of experience with certain well-defined materials, and no argument can be used against them in any shape or form. "Inbreeding," however, it ^{Inbreeding.} may be remarked, is just as legitimate as "outbreeding"—a step in a certain direction. No move is or should be made by the breeder without some purpose in view, and if he breeds or crosses out he is understood to be working towards his object. Some few people adopt, unfortunately, the line of parallel arguments, and, because shorthorns have been most successfully inbred, adopt the same principle in breeding Clydesdales. The objects are, however, entirely different. The spirit of the shorthorn is completely bred out of him, and he becomes a block of beef, just what is wanted. No man would think for a moment of selecting the present shorthorns as plough oxen, were horses forbidden to be used in the plough as at the time of the Norman Conquest. The spirit of the Clydesdale is one of his best characteristics, and in breeding-in for the purpose of getting impressiveness of form the breeder must always keep this in view.

As to "crossing," the establishment of stud-books and the preservation in a clear condition of certain well recognised fountains of Clydesdale blood will be of great assistance to those who have confidence in themselves to experiment. They should, however, establish a system of registration, as the buyers of their produce will not now-a-days accept a mere verbal guarantee as to its blood constituents. With registration, however, such men, working with well-defined material and possessing full knowledge of their subject, may raise animals superior to what are now recognised by the individual stud-book societies as "pure," and establish families similar to those recognised as Bates and Booth amongst shorthorns.

Let such men weigh out the ingredients carefully. Nature will supply the mortar and pestle, and, working slowly but surely, the result will be a general improvement in the draught horse.
